Politics are still trump in Chinese global strategy.

CHINA'S CORPORATE Lenins

J L

n December 10, 2003, Premier Wettwo decades, and for practical reasons seems Jiabao introduced American audien tocked into it for the foreseeable future. Already es to the concept of China's "peacefthe largest trading partner of Japan, South Ko rise" in a speech to students at Harvard Universa, Vietnam, Singapore and Australia, as well sity. Pointing out that China was a poor countas the largest Asian trading partner of America in per capita terms and a backward economyd India, China cannot afford to remove itself in many respects, Premier Wen argued thinatin the global trading regime. More impor China needed a stable environment in whitetent, perhaps, China has not elaborated an alter to rise. He noted importantly that China is risnative concept to the existing order—certainly ing within the global liberal economic ordenot a concept other countries would be remotely choosing participation over the austere autalikely to follow or replicate. Nor is it remotely of the Mao Zedong era. China's "peaceful risik'ely that China could impose a new order on thesis \(\) K? QJJXy Kp \(\) talled a bluxtpd its Asian neighbors. America remains both the to "peaceful development" K?QJJXy KpreemQnent Asian military power and also the I] K)u Gerned to reaffirm what prominen preferred security partner for every significant scholars had been saving for years: Even thoughtry in the region. In strategic terms, China the liberal economic order was designed and ains a decidedly isolated rising power despite built in the West, it was an open order. Risinits growing military capabilities. non-Western states could prosper within this Yet the argument and evidence that China competitive environment without contesting itself choose to becreasing integrated into the basic rules and principles. global liberal economic order, or be persuaded

The argument that China neither wishes nutrat it should do so, is far weaker. Those who is able to undermine and transform the internassume an irresistible trend toward greater tional liberal order is persuasive. China has behimese integration into the liberal economic that order's greatest beneficiary over the paraller—those persuaded of the stakeholder metaphor coined by Robert Zoellick—critically

John Lee is an adjunct associate professor and misapprehend the worldview and priorities of Michael Hintze Fellow for Energy Security at the Centre for International Security Studies, the University of Sydney, and a scholar at the Hudson Institute in Washington, DC.

capital, and the figure is ristingOEs received more than 95 percent of the stimulus monies lent out in 2008–09 and an estimated 85 percent in 2010. The State-owned Assets Supervision and Administration Commission (SASAC) indicates that the assets of SOEs amount to more than 66 percent of all assets in the country, up from 60 percent in 2003. This is the reverse of what oc curred in China during the first ten years-of re form, when the majority of new fixed assets were effectively controlled by the emerging private sector. Even if they were formally "community" enterprises, the plain truth is that private sector businesses received more than 70 percent of all the country's capital.

managed SOEs amount to more than half posttronage system not unlike the political-eco China's GDP each year.

nomic structural relationships characteristic of regimes like Mussolini's Italy, Kemalist Turkey and Franco's Spain.

Politics Is Trump

occurred in China.

This is evident in a number of ways. Al though China's SOEs are called upon to-nomi

he size and the role of the corporate stately behave as profit-making entities, they are in China thus far exceed anything that oviewed ultimately as instruments of the regime. curred throughout the postwar decades of states is clear from the structure of authority in led "authoritarian development" in Asia. The Chinese system. The shares and therefore as key to understanding the differences betweents of SOEs are held by the SASAC, which takes say, Japan's MITI-administered industrial policity structions from relevant ministries. Further and what is going on in China is that other Asiaup the chain, the SASAC is controlled by and states did not deploy business profits to entreacts werable to the State Council of the National a single-party political system; in those societies ple's Congress, China's peak administrative the rise of a genuinely autonomous class-of excellegislative body. 8(b)21(o)21(d)29(y)te 8(6(p)37(nomic elites was accelerated by rapid industrial ization in these other countries. The reverse has

Having shown the dominance of the state in the Chinese economy, it remains to be il lustrated how an elaborate network of political and economic power links the CCP to Chinese state-owned enterprises. Indeed, the structure of the current Chinese political economy is spe cifically designed to ensure that the CCP re mains the dominant dispenser of commercial, business, professional and even social opportu nity. The aim is to tie all privileges and oppor tunities for Chinese elites to Party discretion. While the operation of a domestic and inter national liberal order is designed to weaken or at least moderate favored relationships between the political interests and objectives of the gov ernment on the one hand, and economic activ ity, on the other, state corporatism in China is calculated to achieve the opposite. The CCP takes the fundamentally Leninist view that economic entities and activities must reinforce the economic influence and subsequent-politi cal power of the regime. Such entities and ac tivities may not support political opposition in any form.

Finding inspiration in Karl Marx and Vladi mir Lenin, the CCP was once defined by an ideological hatred of capitalism. That tumul tuous Marxism is long gone, buried alongside Mao Zedong and his murderous associates. But while the CCP's Marxism is gone, its Leninism persists, and the SOE-CCP arrangement that developed after Tiananmen now resembles a the report found that the senior executives of all these firms were CCP members, with many hav ing held provincial political office. In tracing the Americans that China's participation in the global liberal order will lead eventually to China's integration and assimilation into that order, nec essarily accompanied by domestic dismantling of its authoritarian structures. The logic assumes an inevitable and increasing divergence between political and economic agency, interest and ac tivity within China. It assumes that in the end the CCP will prove powerless to prevent (or else is unwittingly allowing) the emergence of a pow erful and independent economic class that will lead to an ever widening gulf between economic and political power within China. The plural ity of powerful interests and interest groups de tached from the Party, it is believed, will force the authoritarian political order to decompress.

These presumptions are based on an ex tremely narrow understanding of possible political-economic arrangements. It is a char acteristic of the denatured Enlightenment mentality to think that the way the West de veloped in this regard essentially fell from the sky as the only logical possibility. It is this same mentality, in even more primitive form, that insists that democracy and open markets are the universal default drive settings for all hu man communities, regardless of historical ex perience. This way of thinking discounts the ingenuity of human beings to devise new paths

е